English translation of an article by Cees Vermaas, Chief Executive Officer of NYSE Euronext Amsterdam, that appeared in de Telegraaf on May 10, 2011:

Strategy

The international stock exchange industry is buzzing with predictions about mergers and takeovers. NYSE Euronext, the US/European stock and derivatives exchange, has announced plans to merge with Deutsche Börse. Another global operator in this market, NASDAQ OMX, subsequently announced that it planned to join forces with the Intercontinental Exchange (ICE) to launch a bid for NYSE Euronext, and if successful, to break up the company and take on substantial debt. In situations such as this, it is up to shareholders to decide which combination offers the best prospects for the future.

NYSE Euronext's shareholders have seen a number of interesting developments in recent years. The development of a framework for building a successful working relationship between US and Europe-based exchanges led to the creation several years ago of NYSE Euronext. In 2010 the focus was on the resulting opportunities for growth, and in 2011 NYSE Euronext continued to build on this successful formula, further strengthening its market position. The results for the first quarter of 2011 make it clear that this structure is a success. Group income rose by 5% in comparison with the first quarter of 2010. And profits per shares by 26% during the same period to $177 million (119 million), and by 48% to $140 million (94 million) in comparison with the last quarter of 2010. This is the best indicator that NYSE Euronext's chosen strategy is a resounding success. An essential part of this strategy is the fact that investors, traders and providers of financial products have access to a worldwide financial network offering almost unlimited trading opportunities. NYSE Euronext's superior technology ensures that all parties receive maximum benefit from the liquidity of the market. The greater the number of parties providing and using financial products, the greater the liquidity, and the more objective the price formation in those markets. Another vital aspect of this system is the fact that the market is fully regulated.

Merging with Deutsche Börse would enhance the effectiveness of this strategy, particularly in the derivatives market, where the benefits would be the greatest. The creation of a European derivatives market based on cooperation between the leading exchanges would allow investors in options and futures to make maximum use of the market's liquidity and opportunities.

This brings us to the central issue in the current situation. The proposal for the merger of NYSE Euronext and Deutsche Börse focuses on growth, cooperation, synergy and ways of increasing the opportunities available to investors and traders. It is a long-term strategy that will create more value for our shareholders. The merger is entirely in keeping with the successful strategy developed by NYSE Euronext. The plan put forward by NASDAQ OMX and ICE serves no other purpose than to allow them to avoid the need to compete with a strong, successful exchange operator. Our managing board has no doubt whatsoever that the preferred solution is the merger of NYSE Euronext and Deutsche Börse.
