AUDIO

Paul Bisaro

Executive Chairman

00:48-01:04

You know, I think one of the single most important things we did at, at Actavis, was create challenge, connect, commit; our, what we call our winning way. And, and, you know, it has really brought together what was a disparate group of people from many cultures around the world.

David Buchen

Executive Vice President
Commercial, North
American Generics & International

01:04-01:23

Our mission about challenge, connect and commit, those aren't just words that are on a poster. People really do, on a day to day basis, conduct themselves in that manner to make sure that the company is a success, but also to make sure that people treat each other with respect and enjoy their jobs when they're at, when they're at the office.

Bob Stewart

COO

01:23-01:37

People can identify with it and they personalize it. You know, I could think about it all the time in terms of I challenge, I connect, I commit, you know, those are, those are three C's that, easy to identify with, they, they span the globe and you can personalize it day in and day out.

Paul
01:37-02:09

But it means so many different things. If you think about how we challenge ourselves in our jobs, in our homes, in, in our, in our neighborhoods and, and all the things that we do and how we connect, how do we connect with our customers, how do we connect with physicians, how do we connect with patients. And then committing ourselves to the excellence that we need to have. If they commit to all those things and they challenge themselves to it, we will not only connect with our customers, we'll connect with each other. And we'll connect ultimately with our investors, and our investors will be very pleased because the results of the company will be the proof in the pudding.

Bill Meury
Executive VP
Commercial, North
American Brands

Yeah, another thing I think the employees should, should know when they think about commit, challenge and connect, is that they have the full support of the management team and that we are behind them 150%. We understand the sacrifices they make to produce high quality work and we will always have their back as you often put it, Brent.

02:09-02:27

Brent Saunders
CEO and President

02:27-02:54

The one thing that you really can't tell till you start doing some of the pre-integration activities and, and getting to know each other better is how the cultures are going to fit together. And, and your winning way is, is very akin to the culture at Forest. Now, I'm sure there'll be some differences, but there're more similarities than differences. And I think, I think bringing the cultures together will be a really exciting part of, of the integration in ultimately creating the greatest company in the world.

Bill
02:54-03:10 As time goes by and as the two companies get more and more integrated, we're going to find that there are many more similarities and differences and we're going to place a premium on things like performance and having a bias for action and, among other things, and I think it's a very promising future.

David
03:10-03:25 The cultures of the two companies are completely complimentary. The senior teams from both companies, have been spending a lot of time with each other and to a number, we all get along well. And we're all rowing in the same direction and we want to make this company a tremendous success.

Paul
03:25-03:30 Sure makes it a lot easier when we're all rowing in the same direction, doesn't it?

Brent
03:30-03:38 But no, those three simple words are great guideposts for our employees. And if they do those things, it will create a great environment for us to be successful.

Paul
03:38-03:45 And I look forward to bringing on Forest people into that and, and helping them get part of, get part of challenge, connect and commit.

Brent
03:45-04:27 You think about what makes exceptional companies, it, it's people, right? And, and, here we're going to have a company that is, is dedicated to its people, is a performance orientated culture, a place where people are encouraged to have fun because they work so hard, but probably most importantly, is a place where people come to work to help other people live their lives better. And that at the end of the day, whether we're making affordable medicine in a high quality, reliable way, or we're creating innovation and new therapies, we're changing and impacting patient's lives. And to be able to all that and, and have that bonus of, of doing great things for people is, is really a home run.
