Dialog Semiconductor Responds to Letter from Elliott Management Corporation

London, United Kingdom, 11 November 2015 Dialog Semiconductor plc (Dialog or Company) (XETRA: DLG) has reviewed the letter and presentation issued by Elliott Management Corporation on November 9 regarding Dialog's agreement to acquire Atmel Corporation (NASDAQ: ATML) and offers the following observations to its shareholders:

1. Dialog continues to strongly support this strategically important transaction. As described on November 2 in Dialog's press release reaffirming the Board's unanimous support for the acquisition, Dialog continues to believe this transaction is in the best interests of its shareholders. The transaction diversifies Dialog's existing customer concentration, increases Dialog's addressable market size, positions Dialog to capitalise on the large and growing Internet of Things (IoT) opportunity, creates significant cost and revenue synergy potential and results in a company that will be a leader in markets that are profitable and growing rapidly over the next several years.
2. Elliott's motivations appear to be based on a short-term risk arbitrage trade rather than long-term shareholder value creation. Elliott does not appear to have the same economic motivations or investment timeframe as traditional long-only Dialog shareholders. Elliott has disclosed an ownership position providing it with 2.9% of the voting rights in Dialog. They have also separately disclosed a short position in Atmel, which would likely provide an economic benefit to Elliott if Atmel's share price were to fall. Elliott has not disclosed the size of this short position nor have they disclosed the size of the economic benefit they would receive should Atmel's stock price fall if the transaction is not consummated. Elliott's risk arbitrage position creates economic incentives that are not aligned with those of the broader Dialog shareholder base.

Dialog is encouraged by the level of shareholder support for the transaction. Dialog is spending considerable time with shareholders leading up to the vote next week and is encouraged by the level of support from many of its large, long-term shareholders that have indicated to us an intention to vote for the transaction. Dialog expects to gain the required vote from its shareholders at the meeting next week.

4. Elliott significantly exaggerates the takeover premium being paid in the transaction. Dialog is paying a 27% premium to the Atmel price on September 16, one day prior to news stories circulating that Atmel was in discussions with a Chinese entity about an acquisition. Dialog is paying a 33% premium to the 30-day average closing price prior to the announced acquisition by Dialog, a 24% premium to the 60-day average closing price prior to the acquisition by Dialog and no premium to the 52-week high price. The premium that Dialog is paying is in line with other recent semiconductor transactions. Elliott's 92% premium calculation uses an unconventional methodology to calculate its own fair value price which does not take into account significant investments that Atmel has made over the years in its 32-bit microcontroller, automotive, security and connectivity products, nor does it take into account transaction synergies.

5. Elliott ignores the significant value creation opportunity available to Dialog shareholders for this transaction. Dialog believes the acquisition will lead to attractive financial returns for its shareholders. Dialog has previously disclosed that it targets (in the medium-term) to grow revenues at an 11-15% annual growth rate with target operating margins in the 23-25% range. This transaction creates a company with both attractive growth and attractive profitability characteristics. Additional financial metrics that support the business case for the transaction are available in Dialog's most recent transaction presentation at the below link(*), including Illustrative 2018 Underlying Adjusted EBITDA generation of between $1.0-1.3 billion and between $5.00-6.00 of Illustrative 2018 Underlying Adjusted EPS.
6. Elliott is inconsistent and incorrect in its characterization of transaction debt. Elliott states that Dialog's post-transaction debt position would be one of the highest in the semiconductor sector and would result in a risky investment profile given the high level of customer concentration. One of Elliott's proposed solutions involves leveraging the company up to repurchase shares – possibly so Elliott can sell its newly acquired ownership position. This would have the effect of adding leverage but without reducing customer concentration or gaining valuable transaction synergies, leaving Dialog's existing shareholders fully exposed. Dialog expects to have the ability to substantially repay the transaction leverage of approximately 3x Net Debt/LTM EBITDA at closing (pre-synergies) within three years. Dialog also notes that other companies in the semiconductor sector such as Avago, Intel, Lam Research and Texas Instruments have successfully used debt as a funding source for large acquisitions.
7. Elliott exaggerates the integration risk with the transaction. Dialog is committed to a successful integration for customers, employees and ecosystem partners. Dialog is working with Bain & Co, a leading global consulting company in strategy, operations and organisational implementation, to assist with the acquisition integration. Bain has significant experience in large and complex acquisition integrations, including those in the technology/semiconductor sector and Dialog will benefit from their involvement in the process. The integration team will be overseen by Jalal Bagherli, Dialog's Chief Executive Officer, with regular reporting to Dialog's Board of Directors.
8. Regulatory and closing schedule update. Dialog is pleased to note that it has received the required regulatory approvals in Germany to proceed with the transaction. Dialog continues to target closing the transaction in the first quarter of 2016, subject to the satisfaction or waiver of the conditions to closing.
